The story is going around that one of our local farmers, after getting his hair cut, asked the price and was told that it was $2.50. The farmer's response was, "Well this is the first hair cut I've ever had that a bushel of wheat wouldn't pay for."

A year ago wheat sold for something like $3.36 a bushel and this year is was $2.15. A few days ago while in a local supermarket, one of the employees was putting in a new supply of flour. I suggested that the price must surely be down, but I was told the new order had a price increase. I said, "Have you heard about wheat prices; they are down 35 per cent?" They hadn't heard about this.

The farmer has a tough time explaining to the consumer that his wheat prices are down but flour prices are up. I haven't heard a good explanation either!

This week I saw a field of corn with the six or eight border rows completely eaten up by grasshoppers.

The grasshopper is a migratory insect, moving from the grass areas to corn, tobacco or home gardens. In recent days we've probably had more calls about grasshopper injury to home gardens than ever before. Devin sprayed in a 12 to 15 foot band around the garden will usually stop this insect.

Grasshoppers are always more numerous during dry springs. In a more normal year there are fungi in the soil that attack the grasshopper's egg and early developing nymphs. If it's dry, there just isn't enough moisture to activate the fungi so we have an epidemic of grasshoppers.

Tomato blossom end rot is a non-parasitic, physiological disorder resulting from an inadequate uptake of calcium.

There are several factors responsible for the low level of calcium in the fruit: low level of available calcium in the soil; high to excessive levels of nitrogen, potassium and magnesium in the soil; highly fluctuating moisture conditions or a combination of these factors.

Reasearch at the Virginia Truck Experiment Station using nine varieties on irrigated and non-irrigated plots for a two year period shows that water does make a difference. The non-irrigated plots had three times as much blossom end rot as did the irrigated ones.

The study also showed that varieties differ considerably in resistance to blossom end rot. Homestead, for example, produced no affected fruit in either the irrigated or non-irrigated plots. Supersonic showed considerable blossom end rot in both. Better Boy and Big Girl, popular home garden varieties, were quite susceptible to blossom end rot under conditions of low soil moisture.

Spraying weekly for about three weeks with calcium chloride at the rate of four teaspoons per gallon of water may be helpful in preventing the problem.

DEVASTATION THAT DOES OCCUR when a large number of grasshoppers invade a corn field is shown in the above photo, according to J. A. Smith, Extension Agent. This was the scene of a corn field at Hix brothers farm near Hixburg. Adjacent to this corn field was a strip of grass. More details concerning grasshoppers appear in the "South 40" column.

Small Businesses Out Number Big Corporations

RICHMOND – If you're tired of the hassles at work and think you want to be your own boss, investigate before you incorporate.

According to the director of Virginia Commonwealth University's new small business development program, Dr. George W. Rimler, most people don't know what they are getting into when they open their own business. Consequently, the failure rate of small business is outrageously high, Rimler pointed out.

"Small business is the backbone of the American enterprise system, " Rimler noted. "Contrary to what most people think, small businesses, not big corporations, account for 95 percent of all business units in the United States, 37 percent of the gross national product and employ 42 percent of the work force."

"While small business plays a major role in the American economy, it is also subject to a high rate of failure. Within five years, 80 to 90 percent of new businesses are gone. Some are absorbed or merged. But generally speaking, most of them fail," Rimler added.

According to Rimler, the high failure is due largely to poor business management such as failure to keep business records, lack of experience, insufficient stock, etc. But another important factor in business failure, according to the small business specialist, is that the novice doesn't understand the philosophy behind the small business concept.

"Many people never ask themselves how their business is going to be unique. If a person goes into a small business only to duplicate what big business is doing, he's dead. You have to realize you can't out stomp an elephant," Rimler said. "The small businessman has to ask himself what he has that other businesses don't have."

The second major fundamental reason for failure is that the small businessman often doesn't recognize the unique assets of the small business organization.

" A small business can do things that larger businesses can not do. The small business is more equipped to cater to certain groups, localize services specialize and personalize services. Often small businessmen try to run their operations the way large businesses are run. And you just can't play somebody else's game," Rimler said.

"Instead the small businessman should 'outcompete' by tailoring his services and goods. Often he can hire better people, not by offering them more money, but by offering them experience is a growing concern, rapid involvement, and ownership potential. Also the small businessman can gain customers through his community involvement. These are the things that big business has trouble doing," Rimler said.

Another pitfall for small business, according to Rimler, is the method of financing. When a business is financed solely on bank loans, the small businessman is often overwhelmed by his debts. And according to Rimler, the chance of failure is higher than it would be if other financial sources were tapped.

"Investments from other people are much more beneficial. For one thing, you don't have to pay the bank so much every month. The other benefit is that you get more people involved in the business," Rimler noted.

Another common mistake novice businessmen make is that they don't get as much financing as they need. "If it is determined that X amount of money is needed for a successful first year, the novice often will opt for getting 75 percent of that amount, thinking that this will carry him through. It's just not so. Borrowing two thirds of the amount you need is like having two thirds of an operation," Rimler said.

Rimler also advises anyone going into business to hire an accountant. "An accountant is a must. Failure to keep proper records is often cited as one of the biggest problems of the small business. The inexperienced businessman thinks that records will mean paying more money to the government. Actually it works in just the opposite. Also good records are important so that trends can be analyzed, so that proper inventories can be kept, and so that the store owner knows exactly what he needs," Rimler said.

The most important thing to keep in mind, according to Rimler, is that having your own business won't solve the problems of the world.

"Often people having a frustrating day at work and decide that they want to open their own business. That's fine. But you have to remember you're getting into a whole set of new problems. While the work may be more satisfying, it won't mean less work or fewer headaches.

Escapees From Prison At 10-Year Low

Escapes from Virginia's state prisons reached a ten-year low in fiscal 1977, according to figures compiled by the Virginia Department of Corrections.

Both the total number of escapes and the rate-per-1,000 inmates were at their lowest points in a decade, despite an inmate population which has risen sharply in the past two years.

In the year ending June 30, there were 136 escapes from the state's 11 major institutions and 30 field units for adult offenders. The number represents 19 escapes per 1,000 inmates in the system.

The population of the state-operated correctional institutions on June 30 was 7,161, not including state prisoners temporarily held in other facilities.

A year earlier, when the June 30 population stood at 5,701, there were 303 escapes, or 53.1 per thousand.

A peak was reached in fiscal 1974, when 578 escapes, or 106.1 per thousand, occured.

Fiscal 1968, which ended with only 4, 138 inmates confined in the system, experienced 179 escapes, or 43.1 per thousand.

$200 Million Expansion At Amheuser-Busch Underway

Williamsburg, Va.–Public tours of the Anheuser-Busch brewery, located on Highway 60 East, have been cancelled due to new construction now under way, according to Plant Manager Richard Heaney. Work on the $200 million expansion is expected to be completed by 1980.

"Upon completion of the expansion, our brewery here in Williamsburg will produce 7.5 million barrels annually of Anheuser-Busch product, making it the second largest of our company's ten plants located throughout the nation," Heaney said.

The Hospitality Center, located adjacent to the brewery, will remain open and will continue to provide complimentary samples of the brewer's products. Also, exhibits showing the process of beermaking will be moved into the Hospitality Center along with displays of other Anheuser-Busch endeavors.

Two new movies, "Day of the Baloons" and "The Kingsmill Story" are scheduled to open soon in the Hospitality Center Theatre.

The Hospitality Center is open daily except Christmas New Year's and Thanksgiving from 9:30 a.m. until 4 p.m. Busch Gardens' visitors may access the Hospitality Center until 10 p.m. via the Eagle One Monorail.
